

Fiona Yin
7th Grade
Maple School

We live in an unfair world. People are discriminated against because of things they can't control. No one should be happy with the way the world is. We should wake up each day angry and ready for a change. This is why if I were a superhero, my superpower would be fairness.

So many people in this world face prejudice because of something that they can't change, even something as simple as their gender. Far too many women in this world are underestimated and forgotten. If you tell someone that you believe in equal rights for women, they might laugh because "women have equal rights already". But while they laugh, they are laughing at the women around the world who are still fighting for equal pay. They are laughing at millions of women who are victims of cruel hate crimes and injustices, just because they were born female. Even today, people face discrimination and segregation just because of the color of their skin. I would help people to realize that regardless of skin color, race, religion, or gender, we all deserve equal chances and opportunities. I would help people realize that fighting for equality is not saying that one religion is better than another, or that one gender is better than the other. Fighting for equality is saying that despite our differences in gender or skin color or religion, we just want our chance to make a difference.

If I were a superhero, I hope to make people realize how powerful this world can be if we overcome our differences and unite as one. I hope to influence change in this world. We may live in an unfair world, but there is a time that a positive change will come. That time is now.