

One person I admire is Jeremiah Denton for showing loyalty, responsibility, and citizenship, leading him to the Medal of Honour.

Jeremiah Denton won the Medal of Honour for showing extreme bravery in a high-pressure situation. He was in a Vietnamese war prison, and he was going to read an anti-american statement on television. Throughout the recording, he was blinking oddly. When the recording made its way to America, people found out he was blinking morse code for torture.

I think that Jeremiah Denton showed loyalty to his country because no matter what the Vietnamese did, he didn't disclose any information. He knew they would do anything to get important plans, locations of base, and dates of ambushes, but he kept his lips shut.

Jeremiah Denton also showed responsibility because he took the time to learn and memorize morse code, so he'd be able to use it when he needed to. Had he not memorized morse code, he wouldn't have won the Medal of Honour. Sometimes, often, really, taking some time out of your day to do something small, it can really, and I mean really, pay off.

The final quality Jeremiah Denton showed was citizenship, or common good. He turned reading an anti-american statement and use it to help his contry. If the Vietnamese noticed this, they might've killed him.

I admire Jeremiah Deton because he showed loyalty, responsibility, citizenship, and bravery for actually having the guts to do it. Thank-you for reading this.
